Dear Dr. Dagatan:

With all parts of the country still within the quarantine protocols, we have to slowly try to come to terms with the “new normal” in the educational system and in taking teaching and learning in the cyberspace. At the heart of these changes and challenges are the crucial roles of the key players – school administrators, teachers and parents.

Given the context of the pandemic, the school heads’ function becomes critical in the implementation of various modalities to extend the education of every learner. Teachers, on the other hand, interpret and implement curricular intents as they deal with the learners and handle the day-to-day demands of instructional aims. Consequently, continuous learning and professional upgrading among administrators and teachers cannot be ignored. Interestingly, parents have to share this role of educating their children while in quarantine. Inherent in this initiative is the idea of lifelong learning.

The current situation of our country beset by the COVID-19 pandemic cannot keep us from creating learning experiences for our educators and students. Considering the many versions of the Community Quarantine (MGCQ, GCQ, ECQ, MECQ), the Department of Education has issued guidelines on how the new normal should be implemented and incorporated into classroom dynamics.

With these developments, ARCZONE Professional Development, Inc. introduces a new program (not just webinar) which aims to address these needs in the new normal. The training program, “Remote Learning through Radio-Based Instruction in the New Normal” has been proposed to help teachers and administrators in developing strategies to enhance their delivery of radio-based lessons.
